I visited Greenwood once, and all my memories of its magnificence are dimmed by the recollection of having seen a superb monument of white marble, defaced, and, I might say, polluted, or pencilings by the way of some fellow living on the margin at least, if not in the very center, of secundrellam. Such a thing is not known at Montgomery. The timber is nowhere finer than in the Counties I have named, and the richness of the Ore can be judged of when I state that the yield is from 44 to 60 per cent."

I have visited Greenwood Cemetery at least twenty times within the last two years, and have seen more than one thousand persons in the enclosure reproach to impropriety on the part of visiters, either in conversation or in manner. Nor do I know of any monument of " white marble defaced by pencilings by the way." This I think is a fancy of the writer's. I don't believe that it is necessary to puff the manners of the New-Englanders by false accusations against the civil-WILLOW TREE.
